Purpose

The motivation, scope and aim of the FUNFI workshop derive from the renewed interest in nuclear energy that has led to new construction of fission reactors and R&D on next generation (GIV) types. Research on fusion reactors is continuing and has recently branched off to include plasmas of limited energy gain constituting powerful neutron sources suited for irradiation purposes, which can be tailored as drivers for sub-critical fission reactors. Fusion-fission hybrid reactors allow increased extraction efficiency of the fission fuel energy with relaxed energy gain demand on the fusion plasmas.

FUNFI will address the physics principles of fusion-fission hybrids and current research. The focus will be on the characteristics of different plasmas in magnetic confinement that can serve as drivers in hybrid reactors, as well as, driver interface to surrounding neutron reaction blankets.

The workshop is directed to scientists and PhD students on FUNFI hybrid research and relevant fields of magnetic fusion plasmas, fast fission reactors, neutron physics, etc., besides those interested in learning more about the potential role of fusion-fission hybrids to provide better nuclear energy.

The program will contain tutorials on scientific/technical background for FUNFI including its potential role in future use of nuclear energy, besides complementary lectures on selected research activities. The program will also include submitted contributions (on magnetic FUNFI plasmas), of which a selection will be made for presentation in the oral or poster sessions. Ample time is scheduled for discussions.

Topics

Tutorials and lectures on:

Present and future nuclear energy uses; GII/III fission reactors and plans for GIV
 Fast neutron reactors
 Fission fuels and heavy mass products
